Way through Adams County in Search of the Chestnut Blight

The state blight scouts who passed through this county several weeks ago in interest of the Chestnut Blight Commission have made their report. The blight was mentioned on May 10 and inspected every strip along in a three mile wide strip along the Mason and Dixon line in York, Adams and Franklin counties, with a more general survey of the remainder of these counties was made. In Southeastern York county the infection was found to be 10 percent to 100 per cent, but in the western part it varied from 10 per cent to 50 per cent.

In Adams county there is a wide strip in which there are practically no native chestnuts. In eastern Franklin county the blight was found to be generally distributed in areas of considerable size, ranging from 1 per cent to 100 per cent. In York county the blight was found scattered here and there in small trees along both sides of the Cove mainline which connects the blight between Franklin and Pennsylvania. Up to the present time, however, the blight has not been found west of this connection in Pennsylvania.

To the north of Fulton county in Washington county, an extensive infection of the blight has been found near Gettysburg. In Northampton county the westernmost edge of infection are near Newton, Hamilton and McKeetown, also near Belvidere.
